

While I am not wholly opposed to the idea of internet wire tapping, I believe the FCC should apply the same standard/burden of proof of phone line "wire tapping" to that which may occur on the internet. Anything less cheapens the nature of privacy over the internet. Congress has already passed legislation mandating the same level of contractuality to what we say over the internet as compared to mail (e.g. internet signatures), so we should have the same rights to privacy as well.